I think having cultural sites noted with designated sign is a good idea. This way, every one who visits the areas can be made aware of the significance and richness of the place. It is nice to visit a place and know a little about the history no matter if you live here or are just visiting. One place in particular that I have experience with is the Hula Mound at Kapolei Regional park. When I visit that area and see the hula mound I am reminded of the legend of the area and remember that I am in the piko of Kapolei. When I share this with whoever is with me, they appreciate the area a little more, and more than just a park. Knowing that the area is a culturally significant site makes us feel like we want to take care of it and be responsible for what it looks like. If there was a sign there, people who visit the area without someone there to tell them about the significance of the place might feel a little more appreciated as well.
